

THE OCCULT PROCESS WITHOUT MYSTICISM

OneOfFourth

CONTENT UPDATE HISTORY

2025-01-30 - Added section Premonition Dreams.

2024-10-10 - Added section Trade Theory Of Magick.

2024-09-04 - Added section How Magick Works: The Big Picture.

2024-02-22 - Updated section Physical Mind Cannot Experience Anything.

2024-02-03 - Added section Why Hand Signs And Code Language Fundamentally Work

2024-02-02 - Rewrote section Physical Mind Cannot Experience Anything.

2023-12-21 - Added section Physical Mind Cannot Experience Anything.

2023-10-20 - First published version.

Foreword

This book is a second revision of the research I am conducting. It's a work in progress: as I learn more, I update this book accordingly.

Described on these pages are the methods and processes how real occultists are affecting our world today. The occult process revealed on these pages is so far progressed in our world that if I simply directly explain what is real and how things actually work, they might not mean anything to the reader. Even worse, the reader could probably think that the presented facts cannot possibly be true based on what the reader already believes to know about occultism. Thus it is important to provide some of the experiments and observations first, so the reader can understand what exactly lead to these undeniable conclusions about the nature of our reality and the people using this knowledge. This way it is possible to uncover all of it, layer by layer, so the reader can truly understand how deep the deception goes. Because of this I implore the reader not to ignore or skip reading the sections describing the experiments which have lead to these conclusions. They are essential part of the research which the reader can also perform and confirm on her own. This enables the reader to see if she comes to the exact same conclusions as have been written on these pages.

What I care about is the truth which has been hidden from most of the humanity, which made it possible to oppress people using covert spiritual methods. I want to uncover the truth, study it and expose it to people in its purest possible form so everyone can benefit from this knowledge. Truth will help humanity get free from oppression and will hopefully eradicate the covert grasp on humanity entirely. Instead of hiding this knowledge for the benefit of the select few, it is in all of our best interest to crowdsource this project. Blessed is he who seeks the truth and convinces others to do so. This is why you should care to study these topics and if you feel the calling, you can hopefully help me progress this work. And remember: which is unknown can hurt you the most. So always be careful while conducting your own research.

- OneOfFourth

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Chapter One.....	5
Magick Effects Are Observable In The Physical World.....	6
Voices And Spirits Are Not What They Claim To Be.....	9
Magick Ignores Time And Language.....	16
What books and religions got right about magick.....	28
Occultists Have Hidden The Real Knowledge Of God From The Masses.....	39
Physical Mind Cannot Experience Anything.....	44
Premonition Dreams.....	50
Chapter Two.....	53
How Magick Works: The Big Picture.....	54
Trade Theory Of Magick.....	66
Why Hand Signs And Code Language Fundamentally Work.....	69
Create Your Own Magick Code Language Using Idioms.....	72
APPENDIX: Theories About Magick.....	75

CHAPTER ONE

The Truth

Magick Effects Are Observable In The Physical World

Here I present three experiments I conducted to find out if magick is actually a real phenomenon or not. In traditional magick practises almost anything seems to work as a viable tool for creating magick effects. That in itself is a strong indication that if magick is a real phenomenon, the tools themselves don't matter at all. Most probably they aren't even required, but can be used if the magick user desires to do so. The tools seem to serve only as a way to communicate the intention of the desired results or to receive those results. One example of this are tarot cards: the tarot reader asks a question from esoteric sources and then picks cards at random to receive the answer to the posed question.

I chose to perform similar tests, but instead of using a deck of tarot cards, I wrote a simple computer program for some of my tests. The idea was the same as with tarot cards: I ask a question from esoteric sources and then let the computer give me a randomly generated answer. Then I compared the results with the real world to see how accurate the answers were.

Below I describe three of these tests. These are the very first three tests I ever conducted. And each of these are the very first results I recieved from them. So there is no "cherry picking" of test results to make them skew in one direction or another.

Test #1

I wrote a computer program which generates a true random number based on the exact moment the user presses a key on the computer keyboard. That random number was then used as a latitude coordinate on a world map. I used this small software to test what happens when

I ask to know the location (latitude coordinate) of one specific person I know.

After requesting the location of that person, I pressed the computer keyboards key and got a latitude coordinate. When I compared its location on the world map, it was really close to where that person was living at that time. The test was a success.

Test #2

The second computer program I wrote was used to generate a true random number based on the exact moment the program was run. That random number was used to pick a word from a dictionary file of over 94 000 words. I used this program to find out what Person-X wants. Person-X is an occultist and is well known to me, which made it easy for me to confirm the accuracy of the results.

I requested to know what Person-X really wants. Then I ran the program and received a random number. I looked at the word in that specific line number in that dictionary file and the word was "occult knowledge" (a single word in my native language). That's an exceptionally specific and accurate description of Person-X which doesn't easily match with most of the other people. The test was a success.

Test #3

I was using a random number generator website for this test. First I relaxed and cleared my mind. Then I asked to know what number from 1 through 100 will appear on the computer screen when I click the "generate random number" button. I received an image of a number in my mind's eye. I clicked the "generate random number" button and the number that appeared on the screen was the same one I had seen in my mind's eye just moments before. The test was a success.

Additional observations

It is interesting to note that in each test case the consequent questions seemed to yield dramatically less accurate results. The very first questions always gave spot on answers in each test case, but the answers which came after them yielded fairly poor results.

Conclusion

It is important to point out that it is impossible to write fully functional computer programs in such a lowered mental state which could produce hallucinations or psychosis. Such lowered mental states and writing functioning computer programs are mutually exclusive. The above computer programs were actually written and were fully functional. Thus the memories of the tests could not have been imagined in any way. They could not have been hallucinations or result of any kind of psychosis.

The above experiments were the very first ones I had conducted using a computer. Also each of them was a clear success on the very first try. Together these two points rule out any sort of “cherry picking”.

The accuracy of the results was exceptional, which doesn’t leave any room for interpretation. All these points together rule out the possibility of the observed effects being just a figment of imagination. These were coincidences of astounding improbability, given how accurate the received answers were to the posed questions.

All these observations point to the fact that what people call “magick”, is actually a real phenomenon and it can be observed functioning in the real physical world. The tests also indicate that magick seems to affect the odds of events moving towards the intended results of the magick user. If the magick user immediately tries to repeat the results, it is highly unlikely that anything worth of noting comes out of it. It might be required to move on to new targeted result to make the process work again in such a short notice.

Voices And Spirits Are Not What They Claim To Be

People from all around the world report experiencing supernatural phenomena. These reports don't seem to differ much based on the culture of those who experience them. These supernatural phenomena are usually reported as being caused by spirits/entities of all sorts.

Description of the phenomena

The broad strokes of a lot of these cases are virtually identical with each other:

- People hear a malevolent/benevolent voice in their mind.
- People experience visions or apparitions, either imposed on top of their eye sight or alternatively they can see them clearly in their minds eye when they close their eyes.
- People experience continuous unexplainable misfortune, trouble and/or torment in their life.
- People experience also other types of supernatural phenomena.
- People have a strong religious experience.

The main characteristics of the voice usually are:

- The voice can discuss directly with the listener.
- The voice can act like it is having a discussion with someone else and is being overheard by the listener.
- The voice discusses mostly about things directly related to the listener.
- The voice keeps hinting about the persons history or previous life, as well as who the listener really is or should be in this life.
- The voice keeps the listener guessing what is going on, instead - of explaining it in a straight and understandable manner.

- When the voice finally explains what is going on, it is usually inspired by the listeners own preconceived notions and theories about what is going on.
- The voice is taunting or reveals information which causes anxiety and fear.

The voice can present itself as being almost anything. Depending on the person, it is often one of the following:

- Individuals own soul.
- Past life self.
- Self from a parallel time or universe.
- Ghost.
- Spirit guide.
- Ancestors spirit.
- God / angel / spirit / etc.
- The Devil / Lucifer / Satan / demon / etc.
- A deity of some sort.
- Alien from another star system / galaxy / place / plane / time / universe / etc.
- Some sci-fi type program / artificial intelligence / etc. which works outside of our own reality, or might even be responsible for keeping it up and running.
- Someone the individual feels passionate about, either in positive or negative way.
- Someone the individual is afraid of, such as a past enemy or a criminal or a government agency.

A common theme with the voices identity seems to be that it has a strong tendency to pull attention to itself, either by mystery, love, hate or fear. Anything goes as long as the one hearing the voice takes the voices comments at least somewhat seriously. Regardless of who or what the voice claims to be, it always tries to be as intriguing as possible in benevolent or malevolent way.

Quite often these people experience visions of various sorts. Many people see all sorts of apparitions on a daily basis, imposed on top of what they see in our physical world through their own eyes. Others experience these visions or apparitions when their eyes are closed, seeing clear visions in their minds eye. The visions/apparitions and the identity of the voices don't always seem to be related to each others. They can appear to have very little in common with each other.

Most of these people also experience misfortune coming their way in all varieties and forms. They often get alienated from the society and friends and have their lives destroyed almost completely. The most often experienced misfortunes are:

- Sudden and permanent financial trouble.
- Legal trouble.
- Loss of important property.
- Loss of job.
- Falling ill, often with a chronic condition.
- Rapidly declining mental health.
- Pets falling ill and dying.
- Neighbours and unknown people bringing trouble on a constant basis.
- Loss of friends and loved ones.
- Becoming alienated from the society against their will.
- Falling out of society's support network.
- Threat of personal loss of some kind.
- Fear due to uncertainty.
- Tormenting dreams.
- Vivid life-like dreams.
- Unexplainable supernatural phenomena.

Observations

Below is a list of several important details about such apparitions, especially voices which can be heard in one's mind. They reveal interesting information regarding the nature of such voices. These observed details are based on my personal observations. Some of these observations have also been repeated by other people.

1) The voice can misunderstand your communication

If the communication in your mind was happening with an immaterial entity, the entity would obviously not care about the words you use. It would directly understand your pure thoughts and ideas. This wouldn't leave any room for misinterpretation.

However, in some of the cases the voices have clearly misunderstood quite a few times some parts of the communication, especially those which have been a bit more technical in nature. Misunderstanding communication is a human trait. This means that the communication can't have happened with an entity of anykind. Thus the communicator at the other end must have been a human or my own subconscious. It is unlikely that the voice belongs to my own subconscious as it would know what I was communicating to it and thus would not misunderstand what I'm saying. Thus the voice belongs most likely to another human being.

2) The voice can have identical limitations to its knowledge as yourself

The voice can claim to know almost anything you can think of. I tested this type of a claim by requesting it to enumerate the first 10 digits of the number pi. I wrote down the numbers as I heard them. When I compared them to the actual digits of pi, they were correct only to the point to which I knew them myself. From that point on they were complete rubbish.

This is not only a human trait, but also a trait of the knowledge belonging to myself. It is unlikely that another person or an entity would have identical limitations to its knowledge with me.

3) The voice can tell you new information which checks correct.

Sometimes the voice can give you information which you didn't know beforehand, and which you are able to confirm to be true. This type of information has usually been terminology and words which I had not heard before. Checking their meaning from the internet confirmed that they indeed were actual real words used in such context as the voice had used them.

This is not a trait of self, but of an external intelligent mind, which is able to bring you new information.

4) Commanding the voice makes another person react physically

Commanding the voice silently in your mind can make another person react immediately and physically. The reaction happens exactly the way you command the voice.

For example commanding the voice to make a vocal sound can make a sleeping person in the same room make that sound inside couple of seconds. After observing that, giving more commands has resulted in that sleeping person follow those commands promptly. These commands were of the nature of “Your nose itches”, which resulted in the sleeping person starting to wiggle and scratch nose. “Turn to your other side” resulted into that person turning on another side while sleeping.

All this indicates that the voice was connected to another human being. Most probably the voice belonged to the person who reacted to my commands while sleeping.

5) Commanding a person directly makes that person react physically

Just like above, but I don't wait for any voice to open up a conversation first. I simply gave the command directly to another person in the same room, silently in my mind. The results seem to be exactly the same as above. The test person was the same who reacted to my commands while sleeping.

Also commanding emotions to another person seems to make that person instantly feel those emotions, be it freaking out or making that person laugh out loud. Usually when this works, the effects are instantaneous and seem to come out of nowhere: you almost haven't finished giving your command when you already can see the effects happening.

This is a strong indication that the person who reacted to my commands is also the owner of the voice which has posed as being all sorts of entities. Commanding the voice gives identical results to commanding that person.

6) The voice can enumerate a detailed long list without errors nor repetition

When asked for a list of rules which the voice bides to, the result is a very long and logical sounding list (about thirty entries or so) which doesn't repeat itself. Coming up with such a list on a whim would automatically lead to self-repeating and overlapping points. However, this has usually not been the case when the voice enumerates its rules of interaction. Also memorising such a list would be somewhat impressive feat for most people.

This is not an easy feat for most human minds to do. As all the previously described effects seem to have been created by humans instead of spirits, it is highly likely that this is also the case with this observed event. This in itself is a fairly strong indication that the observation was about some human trait, which is most likely unknown by the general public. If souls would happen to be real, maybe this feat could be performed by it?

Analysis

There are clear contradictions with the above statements, if it is assumed that the voices originate from a single type of source: self or an outside source. There is also no hard evidence of the voices belonging to an actual entity of anykind, but a lot of evidence of them belonging to human beings. These contradictions indicate clearly that there are likely to be atleast two different types of voice sources: self and some third party.

There is no reason to assume that the situation would be any different to anyone who experiences anykind of telepathic communication with “entities” or other types of anomalies. In fact this is a clear indication that all encountered entities have most likely always been real life humans intentionally pretending to be entities. This applies equally to all humans throughout the history. It could be that entities capable of communication might not even exists at all and all of them are just people pretending to be such beings.

The visual apparitions are quite likely created using the same methods which create the voices in peoples minds.

It is also worth pointing out that if misinterpretations are possible during this type of telepathic communication, it means that deeper thoughts and ideas aren’t automatically (if at all) transferred via telepathy.

It is also likely that some kind of pre-created connection is necessary for these results to happen. That connection is most likely created by the person who posed as being an entity. The exact method of creating this connection is unknown at the time of writing this.

Conclusion

1. It is quite likely that entities/spirits/demons/deities/etc. do not exist.
2. All telepathic communication has a very high likelihood of happening only between humans and never with an entity of anykind.
3. All entities throughout the history seem to be humans pretending to be such entities to other people.
4. There seems to be unidentified part of self in every human being, which has somewhat impressive capabilities of mind.
5. This unidentified part of every human being is likely what makes it possible to communicate telepathically, have spiritual abilities and create effects using magick.

Magick Ignores Time And Language

As my earlier research regarding magick has already revealed, it is possible to affect people without having any direct interactions with them. There is no need to speak aloud, show any hand signs, or touch your target. You can simply state in your mind what you want to happen.

Most of these earlier experiments were performed on people who were in the same room with me during the experiments. Thus the revealed information applied only to situations where the targeted person was located in a physical interaction distance from myself. An exception to this were those experiments, where the targeted person was seen in a live video stream on the internet. These people were usually located on the other side of the world from myself, so they were far away from being inside a physical interaction distance. When these same methods were used on people seen on live video stream, as was used on people in the same room with me, the results were identical. In both types of situations the targeted people reacted to commands given to them. This is a clear proof that distance doesn't matter at all when affecting people with magick. Since physical distance doesn't change the effectiveness of magick affecting others, the next logical question is if it's possible to affect your targets in the past or in the future.

Each video frame you see in a live video stream has already happened at least a fraction of a second before it ended up on your computers screen. Essentially this means that you are observing what happened in the past. A fraction of a second in the past, but in the past nonetheless. Hence magick affecting people in the live video stream is able to target people who you observe from the past, instead of them having to be in your present moment. So the next logical question is:

“Does magick affect the person in the video in that moment of time when the video was recorded, or does it affect that person in your own present moment of time when you are creating the effect?”

The easiest way to figure this out is to experiment on people seen in recorded video footage, instead of using live video streams. This changes the time difference between when the camera captured the video and when you finally saw the video, from fraction of a second, to days, weeks or even years. If one could affect people or events seen in recorded video footage, that would prove that it is possible to affect different points of time: you would be essentially affecting the moment in the past when the video was recorded. Youtube videos are perfect for experimenting with this due to their abundant availability. Reaction videos were specifically chosen for most of these experiments, since they usually have a tiny number of people on screen for long periods of time. This gives a lot of time to plan and execute these tests.

The experiments were conducted so, that a fair amount of time was spent watching the video and getting emotionally somewhat invested in what was shown in the video. Then suddenly a clear and direct command was given silently in my mind to the person seen in the video. If the person reacted to the command properly, the test was a success.

Below is a list of test results which reveal interesting insights into what is actually possible to do with magick. These tests were conducted using the exact same method of affecting others, as was used in my previous similar experiments.

I encourage people to conduct these same types of experiments on their own.

You can interact with the past

1) Man reacting to music

I was watching a Youtube video of a man reacting to a song. Halfway through the video I accidentally directed my thoughts to the man, saying silently in my mind that the song felt like a nightmare. The man started quickly presenting anxiety and said “This feels nightmarish” and continued complaining that he didn’t like the song anymore. The song wasn’t nightmarish, but slightly dark and moody.

* * *

Observations:

1. This is a clear indication that it is possible to affect people you see in videos. Maybe even in other types of media.
2. This was the very first time I had ever seen or heard of that man. This indicates that you don't need to meet or know personally those people you intend to affect.
3. The video was not a live stream, but a regular Youtube video, recorded sometime in the past. This means that you can affect people from the past.
4. My thoughts were not said in english, but in my native language. The man in the video was a native english speaker and has a very high likelihood of not understanding a single word of my native language. Yet he still reacted to my words. This strongly indicates that you can command people using any language, regardless of if they understand that language or not. It is quite likely that you can even invent your own language to affect others.
5. Since you can command people using any language, the commands aren't going directly to the targets mind which then follows your commands. The commands must go to somewhere/something else, which then makes the targeted mind do or experience what you intended.
6. You can affect emotions.

2) "I'm cheap!"

I was watching a Youtuber explaining something about music. I tested what would happen if I asked him silently in my mind "What's your secret?". Immediately the man said "I'm cheap! I pirate all my music." Then he looked slightly confused and slowly started explaining and defending his position on that topic.

Observations:

1. The effects can be immediate when you give your command to a person in the video. This means that your own time and the moment in that video somehow happen "together" with each other. Synchronized through time, when you observe the past in the video.
2. You can affect thought processes which make people do and react to things.

3. You can make people reveal thing about themselves.

3) 1920s Paris

I watched black & white film footage on Youtube. The footage was shot in 1920s Paris, France, over a century ago. In the video there was a short moment where two men were sitting at café terrace. I performed a test by saying silently in my mind to one of the men: "If you want to be much more rich than you are now, you touch your forehead". Immediately the man almost slammed his hand to his forehead, almost knocking off his hat completely.

Observations:

1. The video footage is so old that the man has been dead for most part of the century, already. This is a direct indication that it is possible to affect people from the past who aren't alive anymore.
2. I didn't have to see or connect or get emotionally attached to those men at all, since they were on the screen in total for maybe 20 seconds or so. This indicates that it's somehow possible to affect people you see in passing.
3. It is unknown if the conditional ("If... Then...") I gave actually had any effect to the man reacting to my command. If it did, then it would be possible to interrogate people through video footage without their knowledge.

4) Lord Of The Rings reaction video

I watched a Youtube video of a woman reacting to Return Of The King movie. In a sequence near the end of the movie, I said in my mind to the woman: "The best movie you've seen in your life." About one second later the reaction video cut to a surprising extra added content, which she had recorded on her phone after watching the whole movie. In that extra added content she described how special that moment in the movie had felt, where I had given her the instruction. Right after that the reaction video continued regularly.

Observations:

1. My instruction affected the woman, who then finished watching the movie. Only then she edited the video, and recorded and added the extra content to the exact location where I expected seeing the effect. So most of the effect FOR HER happened after she had received my instruction and finished watching the movie. FOR ME the effect happened exactly when I intended it to happen. This clearly indicates that your instructions can set in motion a chain of events in random point of time, which results in you getting your effect at the time of your choosing.

2. I didn't give the instruction in the form of a command, such as "You think like this". I simply stated how things are according to my own wishes: "This is how it is". But my instruction also clearly referred to the woman in the video: "The best movie you've seen in your life."

You can interact with the present moment

1) Specifying a cars register plate

While walking outside in a peaceful area of my town, I decided to test if non-living things can be affected in the present moment. I stated silently in my mind: "The next car that passes by me has a register plate which starts with the letter R." A car was coming towards me and its register plate didn't start with the letter "R". A few seconds before that car passed by me, another car came from behind me, passing by, and its register plate started with "R".

Observations:

1. You can affect events that happen to you, instead of affecting only someone elses mind.

2) Summoning a person

I was waiting for service in an empty kiosk. The salesperson was nowhere to be seen. I waited for several minutes and then decided to try if someone had tried to make it harder for me to achieve my goals in my life. So I decided to see what happens if I demand rights to have service. I stated in my mind, with a a bit of emotion: "People cannot prevent me from getting service. I get service now!" Exactly the moment I said "now" in my mind, the door opened and the salesperson stepped inside the kiosk.

* * *

Observations:

1. You can affect events in the present moment.
2. As the effects can be observed instantaneously, they must have started gearing towards your intended goal sometime earlier or else natural laws would have been violated. This indicates that the past must have been affected, to give the events enough time to evolve and happen at the right time the natural way, just like in the earlier points.
3. This time I was not aware of the affected person in anyway, except that there should be someone behind the counter. Maybe the responsibility of that job was enough for me to target the right person? Or maybe that person was the only possible choice at that time to make my decision come true? Most likely the only thing which was affected was that my fate brought me the event I decided to have at that exact moment. So maybe no minds were affected at all, and only coincidences were synchronized to suit my needs?

You can interact with the future

1) Sending physical sensations

A Youtuber was lecturing in one of his videos. I knew for a fact that he is a covert occultist, so I decided to test if he would react to one of my commands. In my mind I silently instructed him to look up if he is using magick. He immediately turned his gaze upwards and kept it there for a short while. Then he looked back at the camera and made a hand sign towards the camera. At that exact moment I felt an immediate strong piercing pain in my chest which lasted less than a second. I knew he had hit back at me somehow.

From the Youtubers perspective, he interacted from his present moment with another person (me) in his future. His future was my own present moment. He did all this without ever having seen me or heard of me.

Observations:

1. You can interact with the person who caused you to experience an effect.

2. You don't need to know who caused the effect you experienced, to interact with that person.
3. You can interact with people from the past, and from the future.
4. This indicates that you can send revenge flashbacks even years or decades after someone has anonymously wronged you sometime during your life. You don't need to know who it was and what exactly he/she did to you, for you to be able to "find" them and affect them back.

2) A bad day

Person-X had been harassing me daily for months by sending spiritual attacks my way. Eventually I decided to try to defend myself by hitting back with an effect. I tested if I could cause Person-X to have a bad experience. I did this by stating that Person-X would experience a bad day. The next day Person-X broke an ankle and had to walk several kilometers with that broken ankle. Right after that long walk came to an end, I saw a fly which flew into Person-Xs mouth.

Observations:

1. You can interact with the physical world events themselves, instead of just mind.
2. You can set future events for people to experience.

3) Commenting back at me

There are several times, when I have said something in my mind to a person in a Youtube video, and that person clearly reacted to it, like he/she knew exactly what was happening.

For example a woman in a movie reaction video was listening to another person talking to her. I decided to test what would happen if I said a sentence to her in my mind. She immediately looked into the camera, with a slightly confused expression on her face like she hadn't understood what I had just said. Then she proceeded by showing a covert hand sign to the camera, like she was unsure what she had heard. This all happened while the other person was still talking to her, but at that moment she ignored what that person was saying to her and concentrated looking at the camera.

Another similar example of this happened when I decided to test sending an emotion to a man in a reaction video. The emotion wasn't a negative one, but immediately when I said in my mind that he would feel that emotion, he panicked slightly, but visibly. It looked like he knew someone was trying to influence him. He seemed to be pretending that he was still commenting on what had happened earlier in the video, but the content of his sentences and the tone of his voice were clearly directed to the person (me) who had attempted to influence him covertly. "That's not OK! You get what you deserve!", is what he said, like commenting to someone who had broken some well known important law.

It was clear in both cases that these people were intentionally communicating with a person in their future (me in my own present time). They tried doing it covertly but clearly enough for me to get their point across. This is a clear indication that there must be lots of people out there who know and use this method to communicate and interact with each other. Judging by their reactions and comments, they knew exactly what was happening to them. Also in the second example it sounded like those people have a set of rules they live by, and I had broken those rules, which made that man agitated.

Observations:

1. Magick can be (and is) used for communication.
2. Magick can be (and is) used for covert communication, at least by using public videos.
3. There are a lot of people in the world who know this and use it for communication.
4. These people seem to have their own secret rules and regulations how they interact with others.
5. Do these people use magick to interact with the ignorant masses covertly and regularly?

4) Grocery store

While I was in a grocery store, I was thinking about my financial situation, which wasn't great at the time. My concern was that I would need to get more money to pay my bills, so I decided that I will get it from somewhere. After having that thought, I walked to the grocery store clerk to pay for my groceries. She was concentrating on something in the cash register while at the same time tried to hand me the exchange money from the previous customers purchases. She didn't even look at me while she was doing this. She did not realize that I was not the right person to hand the money to. The previous customer didn't see this happening either, but was also concentrating on packing groceries into some plastic bags. I notified the clerk about the error she was about to make and she handed the money to the right customer. The customer looked slightly surprised that there was still a fair amount of money left from the purchases he had made. Everything ended well for the clerk and the previous customer. The situation felt like I could have just taken the money and neither the clerk nor the previous customer would have noticed anything out of the ordinary happening. I chose to keep my moral standards.

Another similar situation happened a few day later, when I was in the same grocery store and thought that it would be really nice to see a friendly face, after a long while. When I walked back home, during that 5 minute walk I saw someone walk past me, give me a friendly smile and say something nice to me. Then a minute or so later a second person did the same thing again to me, and a minute later a third person repeated the act of kindness to me. I had never seen these people before. Also it's uncommon for these types of random acts of friendly interactions to happen where I live.

Observations:

1. Magick can affect events.
2. Magick can affect multiple people at the same time.

Analysis

Regardless of if I created these effects all by myself, or if someone was covertly helping me, the conclusion is the same: magick can be used to affect the past and the present time. And since other people can affect you from the past (for example through video footage you are watching), then there is no reason why you couldn't do the same to others. Thus it must also be possible to affect the future. Both people and events happening to those people can be affected this way. This applies to yourself as well as to other people.

Affecting people through video footage seems to be possible regardless of how long ago the video was recorded. Even if the person in the video isn't alive anymore, you can still affect him/her. The method of affecting people through video footage stays exactly the same, regardless of how old the video recording is.

* * *

It is also obvious that there are a large number of people around the world, who use this method to covertly communicate with each other through time. It is also fairly evident that these same people use this method to influence/affect others covertly throughout social media platforms.

This raises lots of concerns about the safety of posting video footage of yourself and others on the internet. It is unlikely that interacting with others using magick is limited only to videos of yourself. It is more likely that this same method applies to all sorts of content people post on the internet, including photos, art, audio, text messages, e-mails, and all types of posts on social media, etc.

It is unknown, at the time of writing this, if these effects have a prerequisite of some sort. Here are some possible prerequisites:

1. You can automatically cause these effects on your targets if you simply know what to say in your mind.
2. Your target and/or yourself need to have rights from each other to cause/experience these effects.
3. You have to focus emotionally to you target, or be interested in your target.
4. You have to make yourself connect to some global consciousness where those people are connected to.
5. You have to give an order to your own mind to let you connect to your target.
6. You have to order your own mind to create the effect.
7. Some combination of the above.

Whatever the prerequisites turn out to be, the below axioms stay true regarding what is actually possible to do with magick. The list is not comprehensive, but explains what has been proven to be true with the information written in this article.

Axioms

Magick ignores time.

- You can affect the past, the present and the future exactly the same way without any adjustments to your method.
- Magick automatically affects several different points of time so that you/your target will experience the intended effect at the correct time.

- Your target doesn't even have to be alive anymore to be affected.

Magick ignores language.

- You can use language which your targeted person has never heard of and doesn't understand.

You don't need to meet or know personally those people you intend to affect.

- At least seeing a video of that person is enough for this.
- Your target doesn't have to be aware of you in any way.

You can observe effects immediately using magick.

- You can see immediate effects in people around you.
- You can see immediate effects happening in recorded video footage.
- In other words, events get synchronized in different points of time so you can observe them in your present time when convenient for you.

You can interact with people who have affected you.

- You don't need to know that person's identity.
- That person could have been completely anonymous and you can still affect him/her back using magick.

You can affect minds using magick.

- You can give commands to follow.
- You can cause physical sensations.
- You can cause emotions.

You can affect physical world events with magick.

- People can be made to experience real world events, such as finding new friends, or getting into accidents, etc.
- You can affect yourself as well as others.

People and events are treated equally when commanding magick effects.

- Several people might get affected for the end result to happen you wanted to experience.

* * *

You can create both benevolent and malevolent events with magick.

- Magick doesn't discriminate what kind of events you cause.

Magick intelligently machinates itself according to your intention.

- You don't need to specify any details.
- You only need to specify general idea of what you want to happen.
- Magick takes care of handling the details.

You can interact with magick via mundane media formats.

- At least video recording have been proven to work.

You can communicate with magick via mundane formats.

- Youtube videos can be used for this.
- There are a large number of people in the world who use magick for covert communication via social media.

See the appendix "Theories About Magick" for more information.

What books and religions got right about magick

As the late and great Nobel Price winning physicist Richard P. Feynman once said about theories and knowledge:

"If it disagrees with experiment: it's wrong. It doesn't make a difference how beautiful your guess is. It doesn't make a difference how smart you are, who made the guess or what his name is. If it disagrees with experiment: it's wrong."

This fundamental principle of understanding truths is mostly forgotten by those who study religious scriptures and books of occult knowledge. People seem to be strongly inclined to assume the following about famous books and religious scriptures:

1. That they contain reliable and accurate information.
2. That any observable discrepancy is caused by the ignorance of the reader and thus can be remedied with deeper studies of the same source material.

But what if some of the information contained in those books and scriptures was wrong? Even tiny amount of misinformation in the core elements of those documents can skew the whole knowledge in a fundamental way, rendering the whole document and all its derivatives mostly useless. Hence the very first step when studying any source of information is to find out how well that information correlates with observable reality.

To make these observations as reliable as possible, only physical world observable effects should be considered at first. Purely mental effects could be easily written off as self-suggestions, delusions and hallucinations. Thus they should not be taken as evidence when gathering fundamental pieces of knowledge which are meant to work as a strong foundation for any further knowledge we learn later on. This is exactly what is being done in this study you are currently reading: it compares observable physical world effects of magick with information found in religious scriptures and famous occult books. Teachings of the most famous occult knowledge authors in the history are being scrutinised here. But at first: lets recap some of the key findings from my earlier research...

Magick effects are real

As my earlier study revealed and clearly stated in its topic: “Magick Effects Are Observable In The Physical World”. This conclusion was made based on the very first three experiments I had ever conducted using a computer to find information about topics of interest. In each experiment a computer software was used to generate a random number, which was then used to find the answer to requested information.

The first experiment was made to find a specific persons latitude coordinate on the world map. The generated random number gave the correct requested latitude coordinate inside an error margin of about 2%, which is a very accurate result.

The second experiment was made to reveal what a certain occultist wants the most. The generated random number was used as an index to a word list of over 94 000 words. The resulting word was “occult knowledge”, which is a single word in my native language. That is a remarkably well fitting description of the occultist in question.

The third experiment was a reverse method from the first two ones: I first concentrated “receiving” information into my mind about what random number between 1 and 100 the computer will print on the screen next. After I had a number in mind, the computer was used to generate a random number. The number in my mind and the one generated by the computer were the same. Spot on result.

Each of the three experiments gave an accurate answer on the very first try. Given that these were also the very first three experiments I had ever conducted using a computer, the combined odds of their results are astounding. It was observed that generated random information could be successfully used to gain accurate information about various subjects of interest. If the effects are real and observable in the physical world, as they were here, the phenomena itself is real. It's as simple as that. It's not a delusion.

Magick is not done by using spirits

People around the world report experiencing supernatural phenomena. Large number of these reports are posted on the internet every day. Most of these reports have lots of similarities and are reported as having made contact with spirits of all sorts. My study "Voices And Spirits Are Not What They Claim To Be" has already revealed that it is highly unlikely that spirits of anykind exist. This includes angels, demons, deities and so on. Observations and evidence indicates that all these entities seem to have always been actual real people using spiritual abilities to pose as being such entities.

My above mentioned study revealed that when you actually give a command to the "spirit", people near you tend to react physically and emotionally to your commands, doing what you commanded the "spirit" to do. There's an obvious connection there: if a real life physical person visibly reacts to the commands you gave to the "spirit", there is very likely a connection between that person and the "spirit" you're experiencing in your mind. Especially if this recurring phenomenon each time involves one and the same person reacting to your silent commands. The following proverb comes to mind here: "If it looks like a duck, walks like a duck and quacks like a duck, it must be a duck." All the observable evidence points quite strongly to the notion that the "spirit" was not an actual spirit afterall, but somehow that very person who was reacting to those silent commands.

This in turn is a strong indication that all spirits have always been humans pretending to be spirits, either intentionally or unknowingly. And if this is true today, it must have been true in the past also. This has obviously been going on for a very long time already in our history. Thus it is quite likely that all phenomena around the world attributed to spirits and deities have always been the result of this very same method described here. People simply posed as being spirits to those who had been kept ignorant and oblivious to what is possible to do and achieve using proper occult knowledge. So it is more than likely that spirits do not exist at all. Never have, never will. Since entities are actually people, whatever magick happens to be, it is NOT done by using spirits of anykind. At least not by using forces which people traditionally think of being spirits.

Magick is not about manipulating energies

Not once in the above mentioned studies was there ever any intention to use energies of any kind to create the observed effects. Especially in my study “Magick Ignores Time And Language”, magick effects over time and distance were created simply by stating what should happen. No energies were manipulated in ones mind at all. No mental visualizations of any kind were performed at any point of the experiments. That is a clear indication that no energies of anykind were involved in making magick work.

Magick doesn't require meditation

None of my experiments, results nor observations point to the notion that meditation would be effective or even required to successfully create magickal effects. Magick doesn't seem to be dependent on meditative state of mind.

With all the above observations in mind, lets scrutinize some of the most common sources of information regarding magick...

Christianity and Islam

Regarding their mythology, both Christianity and Islam are quite similar to each other. Both religions claim angels and demons being real. My earlier research has already debunked the existence of spirits. Hence the teachings of Christianity and Islam must be false regarding the spiritual realm and the nature of magick in general.

Christianity and Islam teach that God sets the rules, rights and restrictions, and humans themselves are responsible for governing all those regulations. This is why Ten Commandments are in The Bible. It is also taught that humans have to pray or plead to God to get what they want. My own research points to the exact opposite notion: humans themselves seem to be responsible for setting their own rules, with their very own Free Will. God then governs those rules so they will have an effect on each individuals lives, as defined by those individuals themselves.

* * *

There is not much left in Christianity and Islam which would correlate at all with how magick effects are created in practise. The only thing that seems to correlate well with my research is the claim that some kind of an all encompassing intelligence (God) seems to be real, which affects our world all the time in very concrete and observable ways. But rest of their teachings regarding how God operates don't agree at all with actual experiments and thus must be false information. In fact, the core fundamental elements of both Christianity and Islam point to the exact opposite direction to what experiments reveal about how God operates in our world. Not only that, but both religions deeply condemn those exact practises which would reveal these truths about the ways God influences our world. This massive contradiction between religious teachings vs. results from experiments cannot be a coincidence.

If these religions are filled with false information, it begs for the question "Who designed and created these religions?" As their core fundamentals seem to be the exact opposite to what's true, it is quite possible that some people have intentionally designed and created these religions as tools for hiding the true knowledge about God. Essentially this would make Christianity and Islam integral tools of deception, designed and created by occultists to mislead the masses, in the most literal sense. This last point strongly correlates with my experiments and observations.

Judaism

Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement) is the holiest day in Judaism and Samaritanism and occurs annually. During Yom Kippur, a ritual is performed and the following lines are read aloud:

"All vows, and prohibitions, and oaths, and consecrations, and konams and konasi and synonymous terms, that we may vow, or swear, or consecrate, or prohibit upon ourselves, from the previous Day of Atonement until this Day of Atonement and from this Day of Atonement until the next Day of Atonement that will come for our benefit. Regarding all of them, we repudiate them. All of them are undone, abandoned, cancelled, null and void, not in force, and not in effect. Our vows are no longer vows, and our prohibitions are no longer prohibitions, and our oaths are no longer oaths."

Even though the above translation from Aramaic to English has missed small parts of the text, the content of the translation presents remarkable similarities with what my observations and experiments have revealed about how The Universe/God seems to work in practise. The most obvious similarities are:

1. You make rules, rights, restrictions (aka promises, vows and oaths) for self and others.
2. These are all set by humans themselves for some higher power to govern and affect our lives.
3. You can renounce these rules, rights and restrictions to relieve yourself from their effects.
4. The renouncement is not a prayer nor a request, but a clear direct statement about how things will be from now on.

Jewish scriptures also write about angels, but my research has pretty much debunked the existence of spirits already, so those parts of their teachings must be wrong. Also the need for rituals to create effects seems to be completely redundant, so that part of Judaism is also wrong.

Solomonic Magick

Solomonic magick is said to have played a prominent role in western esotericism and occultism. Practises of Solomonic magick are often associated with the summoning and control of spirits, the use of seals and sigils, and the invocation of supernatural forces for various purposes. These include protection, healing, divination, and the aquisition of knowledge and power.

My research has already concluded that rituals themselves don't have any inherent power to them, per se. Rituals are just an overly complicated and bastardized way of making a simple statement for higher power, what the magick user wants to achieve. Hence rituals are completely redundant and can be replaced with much more simple and straightforward methods. Also my research has already proven spirits of all sorts not to exists, so both of these core teachings of Solomonic magick are wrong. This in turn renders all its derivative practices, philosophies and religions to be null, void and false knowledge.

Satanism / Anton LaVey

Anton LaVeys version of Satanism claims that:

- Almost everything ever written about magick and occult knowldge are fraud.
- Whatever people do, the universe reacts to it.
- Praying to higher power doesn't improve the chances of success and might infact lessen those chances.
- Regardless of the name, Satanists seem to not believe in spirits/demons/angels/entities, nor in Satan itself.

My own research agrees with the above claims. Almost 100% of the literature and scriptures are pure false information, simply based on how they don't agree at all with experiments and observations. Those scriptures have very little to do with the truth about how God or magick actually works.

Whatever people think, say and agree with each other seems to affect what the universe / God brings them later on. Praying doesn't seem to have any positive effect on the outcome. It's much more useful and effective to simply state how things will be from now on, and then things seem to start gearing towards those statements, if people don't intentionally object to them.

My own research also agrees with the point that spirits of anykind don't seem to exist at all. God however is real but cannot be described as being a spirit, but more of an all encompassing underlying intelligence inside our universe, which is able to machinate things in our lives.

LaVey made the claim that humans are most receptive during sleep state, which is when they can be influenced most easily with magick. My own research has also made a very similar observation: you can say something silently in your mind to a sleeping person and observe him/her do what you said. Just like you had given a hypnotic suggestion using telepathy. No special preparations are necessary. Just a simple thought is enough to cause the effect. The success is apparently affected by the sleep state the target is in.

* * *

Anton LaVey also claimed that people themselves are responsible for achieving everything in their lives, not some higher power. My observations partly agree with this. While it apparently is true that there is no higher power which has the duty to make you achieve anything, that higher power is actually responsible for helping you achieve things based on what you decide to achieve in your life. Then you just have to keep at it and take the opportunities that come your way, never diverting from your goals. So Anton LaVey was half wrong with his claim about how God and the universe operates in conjunction with us humans and other sentient beings.

LaVey also made the claim about God that “This powerful force which permeates and balances the universe is far too impersonal to care about the happiness and misery of flesh-and-blood creatures on this ball of dirt upon which we live.” Obviously this cannot be completely true for the very simple reason that God seems to be responsible for actually helping people achieve their goals, if they just put in the work and determination. That in itself is definitely not “impersonal” and “not caring”. It is true, though, that peoples feelings don’t seem to affect at all how God operates. It seems to always start from individuals own decision to have things go some specific way. That is when God steps in and brings opportunities which can be seized by the individual to achieve those personal goals.

Satanism places lots of importance in rituals. As rituals have been proven to be redundant, these parts of LaVeys teachings cannot be true.

LaVey also claimed that to manipulate a person with magick, you must first be able to attract and hold targets attention. This is done by appealing to the targets emotions, such as sexual lust, sense of mystery, fear, etc. This correlates fairly well with my own observations on how and why the spiritual warfare oppressors (aka “the real occultists”) use different tactics to make their victims focus/concentrate on them. But the reason for them doing so might not be the same as in LaVeys explanation. The reason is more likely that keeping targets focus (while the target is not objecting) might actually count as an “OK” or some other form of validation for God / the universe to do what the magick user is saying or suggesting. This has not been confirmed by the time of writing this, so this point requires more research.

* * *

All in all, Anton LaVeys version of Satanism apparently contains some real knowledge about how God and magick work in general. Compared to Judaism it seems to describe mostly derivative methods, instead of actual core fundamental mechanics of God and magick. Also some fundamental parts of LaVeys Satanism do not lead to beneficial development of society and culture, but have a strong eroding effect to them.

Aleister Crowley

Crowley wrote: "Do what thou wilt shall be the whole of the law" and "Be your best self" and "Pursue your true will". My own research points to similar notions about how God/the universe seems to work in favour of individuals. But it seems to be somewhat more complicated than that. First you must decide and declare to yourself what is going to happen. Then you must not let others affect your decision at all. That is when the universe seems to bring events and opportunities your way which help you achieve that goal.

Aleister Crowley was not fully convinced if spirits were external entities dwelling in spirit realm, or if they might have been just parts of our own psyche. He said that regardless of what is the case, spirits behave like they are real. He did not however indicate that spirits might be other peoples psyches in addition to own psyche, as my own research strongly indicates. So it is fair to say that Crowley was onto something, but he didn't explore the idea any further.

Reading Crowleys writings gives an immediate impression of someone wanting to create drama, instead of trying to reveal any actual information to others. In general, Crowleys writings feel like magickal ritual chantings from Hollywood movies. They are also filled with names of deities of all sorts, most of which might be what Crowley came up with on his own. To put it bluntly: Aleister Crowley seems to have been more of a showman than an actual occultist.

There is absolutely no reason to write about occult knowledge the way Crowley did, other than for creating a shroud of mystery around oneself. If he truly was able to create actual magickal effects, he must have kept all that proper knowledge to himself. If Crowley wasn't a pure fraud, then he must have been a real occultist who wrote with the full intention of misleading others by occulting the true knowledge about God and magick in general. Alternatively he was exploited by real occultists, who made him believe he was able to do what he thought he did, which seems to be a common phenomena among occultists and regular people. In any case, Crowleys writings cannot be taken seriously.

Helena Blavatsky

Helena Blavatsky wrote about large number of Microcosmic and Macrocosmic planes, each of which have subplanes. Each of these planes correspond to different states of human consciousness or to the physical plane itself. My research and experiments have not given any reason to suspect any of the sort, which hints of Blavatskys descriptions being false knowledge.

Blavatsky herself stated that she intentionally wrote in a way that it's very hard to find direct answers and understanding from her writings. Additionally what she wrote about does not correlate at all with observations and experiments. Still it was said that she was clearly able to conjure up magickal effects at will. If these stories are true, it would strongly indicate that she was an actual real occultists, who wrote her books to mislead and deceive others from finding the knowledge she herself possessed. This essentially makes her teachings highly unreliable at best and completely void of actual true knowledge at worst. Either way, her teachings cannot be taken seriously.

Conclusion

All occult books and scriptures which claim that magick is about manipulating energies don't seem to correlate with observable reality, so they must be wrong. Same goes with all those books which claim that meditation is required to perform magick. Also books which claim that magick is done by communing with spirits of anykind are wrong. So are all the books which claim that spirits, demons and deities are real.

In short: almost all books and scriptures ever written about religion, esotericism, spirituality, occult knowledge and magick are humbug. Plain and simple. There's no way around that fact. Apparently only

Anton LaVeys Satanism and Judaism (out of all mainstream writings) contain some verifiable truths about how God and magick actually work, but even they seem to contain false information which doesn't agree with experiment.

So which one do you trust more? The physical world observable results from experiments which have been repeated by others, or all those books and scriptures which don't agree with such experiments?

Occultists Have Hidden The Real Knowledge Of God From The Masses

Real occult knowledge is nigh impossible to find online due to real occultists

There is a growing interest in the world towards “occultism” and “occult knowledge”. People look for it online and read books to learn more about it. The word "occult" means hidden, as in knowledge hidden from the people. That word in itself describes the whole problem people have when trying to find any actual real occult knowledge from books or from the internet: its availability is slim to none because the real occultists are doing their very best to keep that exact knowledge hidden from those who seek it. This means that the real occult knowledge is usually nowhere to be found in the books and online. They do this because that knowledge is invaluable and gives real covert power to those who possess that knowledge. Having monopoly over such knowledge has an immense appeal to human nature.

Real occultists are on a mission to discredit and defile
God

Real occultists want to keep a monopoly over all the true knowledge which enables them to influence minds, fates and actions of people and to gain information about them. This occulted knowledge is all about how the universe, God and the human mind actually work together and what can be achieved by using them this way. Real occultists don't want people to learn nor understand anything about this knowledge and they are doing a really good job at keeping it hidden from the public.

This is why occultists have been on a mission for a long time to discredit and defile God and its followers in the eyes of the general public. As people become irritated even from hearing the word "God", it drives them away in masses and keeps them from getting interested in the subject and thus from conducting any real research on it. This prevents people from making any actual discoveries regarding how God and the universe actually work in conjunction with conscious beings such as humans.

Real occultists are out to discredit all real information about God and The Universe

Real occultists are on a mission to discredit all real information about how God and the universe actually work. Discrediting information is an effective way of keeping people ignorant about all the real occulted knowledge. This discrediting isn't done to just the information itself, but also to all the people who try to uncover it.

The standard ways real occultists have been taught to respond to most often encountered situations with those who seek the truths are the following:

- "Do you know how crazy that sounds?" is often used to quickly end any conversation when someone brings up real truths about their occulted knowledge. The goal is to quickly discredit the one bringing up the real knowledge they aren't allowed to talk about.
- "That sounds like a conspiracy" usually comes up immediately after someone claims that the status quo accepted by the masses isn't the whole truth and that there's more to the story.
- "You are condescending!" is usually used when the real occultists are faced with difficult questions or proof which goes against their manufactured propaganda. This is usually used to allow them to quickly exit the scene so they avoid having to explain something they cannot and are not allowed to discuss about.
- "Your belief system sounds cult like" is used as a last resort when truths are being told and there is nothing the real occultists can do about it. The goal is to discredit the one sharing real information about topics they wish to cover up.

- On social media, such as internet forums, the real occultists can give you increasing amount of points to give answers to. As the number of required answers builds up high enough, it becomes highly impractical to answer even half of them as the total amount of text would become overly long. At that point the real occultist will accuse you of avoiding answering his questions and will eventually accuse you of being a liar. The real occultist will intentionally keep ignoring your own answers, including why you are not addressing all his points, to keep attacking your credibility.

It is important to note that the real occultists usually don't straight up deny any of the truths but only aim to discredit them or distract people from turning their attention to the truths. That in itself is a clear recurring theme how they work. They seem to avoid claiming that the real truths are lies or that the person talking about them is wrong. In other words they aim to give false information without actually lying. They manipulate people into making wrong conclusions based on the information they are given. Once people believe in their own misinformation, they will also spread it to other people.

This is a very intriguing observation that they avoid giving direct lies about God and the universe. Especially considering how immoral their work and methods are. Why not go all the way and just give blatant lies to everyone about how God and the universe actually work? This indicates that there could be something they know about God and the universe which they would be violating if they were directly lying to the masses. Thus they might be forced to take the long road and use peoples own imagination and Free Will to let them misdirect and lie to themselves. This way the real occultists won't suffer the consequences, whatever they might be. Or maybe it's just easier not to lie directly and simply avoid telling the truths: then the real occultists are not technically lying and thus cannot be caught lying. Then they have a "clean conscience" and look less guilty in the eyes of others. Whatever the real reason for this behavior is, the details of it are still unclear to me at the time of writing this.

When the real occultists post seemingly informed and helpful answers on social media related to their own expertise, they always seem to avoid talking about the real occulted knowledge. They do however discredit/ridicule any information which actually touches that knowledge. They might also bring up common ideas about the topic which they know to be false and ridicule those false ideas and explain why they cannot be true, thus seemingly but falsely disproving the original ideas which had hints of truth to them. They also often give commonly accepted misinformation, explaining that "this is what people do/believe" instead of saying that "this is how I say it is and this is the truth". This pushes the responsibility of the lies on others and people drift further away from the occulted pools of privatized knowledge they guard so jealously.

Real occultists manufacture and nurture misinformation to hide truths

Real occultists manufacture and nurture misinformation to hide the truths about how God and the universe really work. That is why they need atheists, religions, false ideologies, false beliefs and misinformation to discredit the real information they wish to cover up. The more misinformation and red herrings are out there, the better it works for the real occultists' agenda as people fail to recognize the truths from huge amounts of competing misinformation. This way no-one is able to connect the dots that something greater is at play. With the amount of misinformation vs. real information that is out there regarding these topics, the odds are greatly in favour of the real occultists. This is a very lopsided competition, as the masses are ignorant of the competition they are in and their time is just about running out.

To feed the masses with manufactured and nurtured misinformation, the real occultists pose as being gurus, witches, spiritual healers, priests/reverends, exorcists, atheists, scientists and all sorts of other types of people. This allows them to spread their false knowledge actively and intentionally. Essentially any position where they can control the flow of information to people is of great interest to them, be it social, legal, political, artistic or technological position or title in our society. They want to invade and be in those position where people get all their information from. They want people to rely on them, to their knowledge and to their expertise so people don't need to learn the real truths, nor could they even if they wanted to. They want to control the flow, quality and content of information available to the masses and thus affect the public opinion to be able to recruit unknowing people in masses to further their agenda of discrediting any and all true information they wish to cover up.

Real occultists communicate and teach their ideas only by covert methods

You won't catch real occultists performing any of their rituals, wearing mystical robes, wielding ritual knives or making any sacrifices to any spirits/deities. They don't need any ritualistic meetings nor items to perform their magick. In fact those things would only hinder their effective and direct methods. They use magick/spiritual abilities to communicate and teach their knowledge and methods to others. Not a single word of that knowledge ever gets uttered out aloud or written down on a paper. If they did it right in front of your own eyes, you wouldn't be any wiser since you wouldn't recognize what is happening. The only giveaway you might notice is their covert choice of words and sentence structures combined with their covert hand signs they frequently use. That is their way of communication and influencing everyone and everything around them and they intend to keep it that way. If they break these rules of their society's covert existence inside our own society, they get into serious trouble, created by their network and their knowledge of how God and the universe work. They fear the repercussions and that is why you will never find a co-operative real occultist who would be willing to reveal any of their knowledge to outsiders.

Physical Mind Cannot Experience Anything

Mind functions are created by the physical brain

When a person becomes intoxicated by alcohol, the brain functions slow down. The more intoxicated the person is, the less effectively those brain functions work. When a person drinks himself completely unconscious, there is no active mind present at all. This is a strong indication that mind and all its basic functions, such as thinking, understanding, the ability to grasp meaning, emotions and senses are formed inside the physical brain. If they weren't, alcohol and other drugs would not have any effect on the basic functions of the human mind.

Conclusion:

- Functions of the mind are apparently created inside the physical brain.

But what exactly is required for us to sense these functions happening inside our brains?

Senses are electrical signals going through our nerves

Scientists have developed bionic eyes. These implants function as electrical retinal prostheses and are surgically inserted into eyes. These electrical photoreceptors sense the light coming into the eyes, and forward that information as electrical signals into the eyes optic nerve. They replace the function of eyes own photoreceptors and require a healthy optic nerve to work. This technology is still in its infancy stage, but it already allows people to recognize visual shapes and shades of light. Since this technology allows humans to see the signals sent into their optic nerves, it essentially means that human senses are simply electrical signals (data) flowing through our nerves and into our brains.

So our senses create electrical signals. Those signals are forwarded into our nerves. Hence those human sensory organs could be replaced with electrical technology if it was able to send identical signals into our nerves as our regular sensory organs do. In such a case our brains would not be able to tell any difference between the two sources of signals. Thus it doesn't matter what the actual source of those electrical signals is, as long as the signals are compatible with what our brains can understand.

Since it is possible to replace human senses with electronic technology, it must also be possible to do the same for other parts of our nervous system. In theory it should be possible to record all those signals from our neurons (nerve cells) into a computer and play them back at later time. This would be like a video recording, but for all the human senses, emotions and thoughts at the same time. That would create a lifelike experience for the one experiencing the recording.

Conclusions:

- Human sensory organs create electrical signals, which are transmitted into nerves.
- Nerves transmit those signals forward into the brain.
- The source of those signals doesn't need to be an intelligent biological being.
- Identical signals could be created by electrical devices and the brain could not tell the difference.
- Hence all the signals going through nerves are essentially just data.

But what part of ourselves is actually experiencing all our thoughts, senses and emotions? To answer this, we need to start from the very fundamentals...

Atoms cannot have consciousness

Think of a single atom. Another atom can bump into it, making it bump into the next atom, essentially transmitting information by mechanical means. Alternatively electrons can use that atom to move through it into other atoms, hence also transmitting information forward as electricity. A chemical reaction might even join atoms together to form a molecule or split that molecule back into separate atoms. In each case the atom itself experiences absolutely nothing since it does not have any form of consciousness. The atom itself is just a lifeless physical building block which transmits signals, similarly to a copper wire transmitting phone conversations. This fact does not change, no matter how many atoms you group together to transmit or modify those signals: each individual atom will always stay completely incapable of experiencing anything at all. Atoms are their own individual separate units. Hence if single atoms cannot have a consciousness, then larger groups of atoms cannot have a consciousness either.

It's just like having two rocks: if a single rock isn't intelligent, then adding another rock next to it doesn't make them think any better. Even if you created a complex mechanical stone machine capable of running an AI program, none of its stone wheels and cogs can think anything at all. They stay equally stupid regardless of how you use them together. The "intelligence" of the AI running on that stone machine happens in the data (i.e. signals) which those mindless cogs and wheels are processing. Hence the whole machine stays stupid and incapable of actually thinking anything at all. Ever.

This same principle of physical matter staying mindless holds true regardless of how complex the group of atoms is. Hence if the atoms formed an actual real physical brain, that physical brain matter must be incapable of having a consciousness on its own. Essentially this means that atoms, and the matter they create, can never experience anything at all. Ever. No matter how complex the atomic structures are. Those atoms can only transmit and process signals according to laws of physics. Nothing more. Nothing less. Hence if physical matter is always incapable of experiencing anything at all, this directly means that all the thoughts, senses and emotions we humans have must therefore be experienced by something else than our physical brains.

Conclusions:

- Individual atoms are incapable of experiencing anything.
- Large and complex groups of atoms are also incapable of experiencing anything.
- Physical matter is incapable of experiencing anything.

- Our physical brains cannot be what is actually experiencing our thoughts, emotions and senses.

Experiencer is missing from the equation

This leaves us with the signals themselves, which go through our brain cells and apparently represent our thoughts. These signals could in theory be saved as digital data onto a computer. That data would describe what exact signals each individual brain cell had inside them at some exact moment of time. But those signals themselves can not actually experience anything, ever, since they are just data which represents something. Just like a book: the words written on its pages do not have a consciousness and thus cannot have any kind of an experience at all. Something external to those words (like a human reading them) needs to interpret them before they can gain any meaning. It's exactly the same situation with all those signals happening in our brains: those signals are just abstract data which can gain a meaning only when they're being interpreted by something else. From that data it would be possible to interpret the thoughts, emotions, senses and the whole experience the person was having at that exact moment when the data was captured. And that is the key to understanding what is actually missing from that whole equation we call a consciousness:

1. Something must observe the signals happening inside the brain cells.
2. Something must interpret what those signals mean.
3. Something must create an experience for itself from the interpretation of those signals.

But what part of ourselves is actually experiencing all those signals happening in our brain? It cannot be the signals themselves, as they don't do anything else except flow through our neurons: the signals don't experience anything at all. They're just data. It also cannot be the physical brain itself, as physical matter is incapable of having any kind of an experience at all, as was pointed out already. So where exactly does the experiencing of all the data found in our brains happen then? Where is that phenomenon hiding? What is missing from that equation, which does the actual experiencing of all those signals we call thoughts, emotions, sensations and memories?

Physical mind alone cannot experience anything

If the phenomenon of experiencing does not and can not happen inside a physical mind, nor in the signals themselves which are going through our brains, then where can it happen? Some fundamental and integral part is completely missing from this equation. Physical brain processing incoming sensory data cannot alone experience anything at all. So what is the missing link between all that data inside our physical brains and us experiencing what that data represents to us? What is it which actually has that conscious subjective experience we are having every second of our lives while being awake or while having a dream at night?

Essentially we have data inside some physical medium called the brain, which apparently contains the mind, and then we have the experience itself happening somewhere. And there doesn't seem to be anything in between the two to connect them in any way. Apparently a whole new field of science is missing from that equation, which would be responsible for explaining why we are capable of experiencing:

- What it looks like.
- What it sounds like.
- What it smells like.
- What it feels like.
- How emotions feel like.
- How thoughts feel like.

An experiencer is required

So our biological physical brains should be incapable of experiencing anything at all, but here we are having all these vivid experiences all the time. That is a strong indication that the thing actually experiencing everything must somehow be non physical in nature. Since we experience things in "first person", it strongly indicates that the thing experiencing everything is an integral part of ourselves. Whatever it is, we will call it "The Experiencer" from now on.

It is important to note, that if the information was flowing only from the brain to The Experiencer and never back again, our brains would not be aware of what The Experiencer is experiencing. Thus our brains would not be considering all these ideas written here. But we ARE personally fully aware of our own experiences. We can imagine and visually see things in our minds eye. We can smell odors and feel the touch of things on our skin and feel our emotions. Essentially this means that The Experienter must be feeding information about all those experiences back into our physical brains. Our brains then react to the incoming information and thus we can be aware of "self" experiencing it all. This way our physical brains can properly react to experiences and can think about them and talk about them.

So at minimum The Experienter does something close to the following:

1. It observes and interprets what all the signals in the physical brain cells mean.
2. From that meaning it creates concrete experiences for itself.
3. It feeds the physical brain with information about what that experience felt and looked like.

We also know that the following must be true about The Experienter:

- It is somehow non physical in nature.
- It is able to interact with physical matter, such as brain cells or at least signals moving inside them.

Essentially all this means that consciousness cannot raise from building blocks which themselves lack consciousness. In this case: physical matter. Hence there has to be something extra which science is oblivious to, which would explain how we can experience the things we do.

Premonition Dreams

There are claims that premonition dreams are just a form of déjà-vu, where the brain does some tricks fooling you into feeling that you've experienced the moment before. I have seen many premonition dreams when I was younger. Here I analyse two of them to see what can be logically concluded from them.

Experience #1

This experience happened to me when I was very young, maybe around 5-7 years old. I saw a dream where I was visiting a local toy store with my mother. She was going to buy me one specific toy I had wanted for a long time. In that toy store there was only one other customer: an old lady standing on the other side of the room, facing the wall, wearing light blue long coat and white beret.

When I woke up, I remembered that dream and the old lady really well, as well as what she was wearing and where she was standing, etc. I thought about that dream quite often for the better part of the year, until almost one full year later the following happened:

I was visiting that same toy store with my mother to buy that exact toy I saw the dream about. When we went into the store, I saw the exact same old lady, in the exact same spot, wearing the exact same clothes (light blue long coat and white beret) and facing the wall. I was standing in the exact same spot as I had been in my dream. Everything was 100% identical to what I had experienced in my dream almost one year earlier.

Observation

The effect could not be scientifically explained déjà-vu, since I had thought about that dream many times during a year before it ended up happening in actual real life.

Experience #2

I was sitting in my high schools library. Suddenly I saw Teacher-X walking past me. This triggered my recollection of a dream I had, which was 100% identical to what I was experiencing right at that moment. I remembered that the next thing in the dream was Teacher-Y walking into the room. Only few seconds later Teacher-Y indeed walked into the room just like I remembered from my dream. Then I remembered that the next thing in the dream was that some girls would start laughing somewhere behind me. After couple of seconds a group of girls started laughing somewhere behind me, just like they had done in my dream. What I saw and heard was 100% identical to what I had experienced in my dream.

Observation

I could tell in real time what would happen next, before it happened. This I could do simply by remembering what happened in my dream. Since I could tell beforehand what happened, it cannot be a deja-vu.

Analysis

The above indicates fairly conclusively that premonition dreams are real. Only if a fairly large amount of tightly interconnected false memories have crept into my mind, then there could still be some doubt of those experiences having been real. But since it is highly unlikely that such large amount of complex interconnections would happen, it is more likely that the premonition dreams happened, instead of them being false memories.

Since the premonition dreams were 100% identical experiences to what I ended up experiencing in real life, this is a strong indication that it is somehow possible to actually see and experience the future. How exactly this happens, is not known to me at the time of writing this, but I can think of several potential concepts which could make this happen:

* * *

1. Past self reads/downloads the experiences from the future self.
2. The future self sends/uploads the experiences to the past self.
3. #1 and #2 both at the same time.
4. The minds of the current time self and future self are somehow joined together while experiencing the premonition dream. I.e. they are not sending or receiving information, but experiencing together.
5. Synchronicity: the universe machinates intelligent coincidences in ones mind, which create the dreams which end up being identical to the events one experiences sometime in the future.

If one can experience this while dreaming, then it is probably possible to do it also while being awake. Then the next logical questions are:

1. How to do it intentionally while being awake?
2. Can it be done with other people too, enabling one to see other peoples experiences from the future/past?
3. Can one intentionally send any kind of information to oneself back and forth between different times?

I can't help but notice that the above lists fit the definitions of telepathy, mind reading, divination, precognition and premonition dreams very accurately. Potentially all of them could be one and the same thing, which would make a lot of sense. Also if it happened to be possible to do the above interaction between two people, would the sender of the information be able to easily convince the ignorant receiver that it was God/Devil/angel/demon sending the experiences and/or information?

Just some food for thought...

CHAPTER TWO

Theories

How Magick Works: The Big Picture

As my research has progressed further, a certain type of a high level image has been slowly forming in my mind about how magick works and what it actually is. In this article I describe how I see it at the time of writing this.

I encourage all the readers to experiment, research and either prove or disprove every single point to the last detail in this article. The more points in this article get proved/disproved, the better, as it will rule out the false information and highlight the truths about how magick fundamentally works.

The meaning of your action sets a function for the universe

Let's get straight to the core of how magick works:

You say, it happens if no-one objects to what you say.

What this means is:

1. You set the rules for how the universe works by stating something.
2. If someone objects to what you stated, then it doesn't affect the outcome.
3. If there were no objections, events will then move towards that outcome.

You can say your statements in words, text, text messages, handsigns, pictures, art, movie scenes, Youtube videos, music, lyrics, dance, spells, rituals, thoughts, etc. Apparently the exact method doesn't matter.

You can assign meaning to almost any action you can perform. Performing that action is essentially communication of that meaning. If that meaning is a statement about something, by performing that action you are essentially communicating rules for the universe to follow. The universe then functions according to the rules you set with your statement.

Objections restrict what the universe does

From the universes perspective, things are either allowed to happen or disallowed to happen. There is no middle ground. If a person hasn't consciously denied something from happening, then that is equivalent to allowing it to happen if someone states so. You can disallow something in two ways:

1. You consciously state what is not allowed before anyone attempts it.
2. You consciously object when someone states something.

You can for example state in your mind that "X does not happen to me." Alternatively if someone states that "X happens to you", you can object to it by simply stating "No", or by using any other sentence which is an objection.

Your statement either works or it doesn't. Repeating your statement like a mantra does not increase the chances of it working any better. The only apparent exception to this is if someone tries to counter your statement: then you can make the same (or similar) statement again to overrule the other persons opposing statement, as was described above.

You need targets focus and validation to circumvent restrictions

If someone has disallowed something from happening to him/her, the universe will not co-operate with anyones attempts to make that thing happen. It is equivalent of the universe saying "I don't have the authority to do that. Your target needs to approve it first." To circumvent this, all the following points need to be met when stating something which that person has disallowed:

1. You have to communicate directly with that person.
2. That person has to observe your communication for example through mundane senses.
3. That person has to focus on your communicated statement.
4. That person must not object to your statement.

If all the above points are met, that counts as a validation for the universe to make your statement have an effect. Consequently this rules out remote methods where you don't interact with the target in some concrete way. For example stating something in your mind won't get your message across to your target if such attempts have been denied. Neither does a remote spell nor a ritual. You need to get face-to-face with your target, or have a phone call, or send an e-mail, etc.

Using covert methods to state something

Here comes the interesting part: The universe apparently has left it up to the conscious beings themselves to ensure they're communicating using common methods they understand. The universe apparently requires only that one person makes a statement and the other one is focusing on that statement and doesn't object to it. The universe doesn't seem to care what the method of communication is or if the target actually understood what was said. This makes it possible to obfuscate what you really mean and still get validation from your target without his/her knowledge. This allows you to use covert methods of influence, such as the use of code language, hand signs, icons/sigils, etc. You can use such methods to covertly gain permissions to do something your target has denied.

For example you could have a discussion with your target, and when his/her attention is clearly focused on what you're saying, you can state whatever you want using any covert method you can come up with. If your target didn't disagree with what you said, your statement should have an effect.

Supportive mental state

Getting your target into supportive mental state almost guarantees he/she won't object to what you state. As a consequence it allows your covert statements stay uncontested and thus have an effect on your target. For example people rarely say negative things when a person joyfully and enthusiastically explains about something they really want to do. Usually in such situations people act supportively toward the enthusiastic individual.

Same usually happens when you lament about some injustice you have (allegedly) experienced. This works best if you are a woman, cry, and look really sad while doing so. This makes people empathize and pity you and thus they move into supportive mental state towards you.

You could also achieve this supportive mental state in your target by hinting that your target might gain some personal benefit from you, whatever he/she happens to consider to be of value. For example fame, power, wealth, contacts to important people, sexual encounter, etc. can be powerful ways to draw the targets attention to what you're saying and have them quickly move into a highly interested and agreeable/supportive mindset. Flattering your target probably achieves the same effect by drawing their focus to you sweet words.

These same methods are likely to work well via Youtube videos, movies, TV-shows, stage performances, advertisements, etc. as the viewer is mentally engaged with whatever is shown to him/her on screen, on billboard, or on stage. People rarely resist when they observe something attention grabbing in such media.

People apparently get into such an "open" mental state when they perform to others, be it in real life or on social media videos, as they often hope to receive praise and admiration. Apparently this leaves them wide open for incoming statements, without any protection against them.

Keeping your statements secret

For a successful effect to happen, you don't want to inform others about your intention before the result comes to pass. This is because others might not agree with your attempt, which in turn would nullify your intended effect. For the same reason, if you want to affect others, you don't want to let anyone know about it as someone is likely not going to agree with what you're trying to do, which again would nullify your effect. Only after the effect has already manifested itself, others cannot stop it from happening anymore.

In other words the effect does not happen if someone contests it, i.e.

does not agree to it happening your way or decides beforehand that the outcome will be impossible. This is why you cannot win a lottery using magick as you would be competing against millions of others who want the exact same thing for themselves. This also makes it nigh impossible to test this phenomenon in a laboratory environment as someone who knows about the experiment is bound to decide in their mind that the end result will not happen. Often this would be a sceptic of some sort, such as an atheist.

How to form a statement

Statement is not any of the following: a question, a plead, a prayer, a suggestion, a guess. Statement simply communicates how things are. To state something, you say it like it already is a fact, was a fact, or will be a fact. Example statements:

- “Neighbour is ignorant of how X works.”
- “Neighbour has experienced trouble”
- “That leads to misfortune”.

Instead of using words, you could apply a meaning to some action and then perform that action, as was explained earlier. For example you could decide in your mind that “If Person-X takes this cookie, it means he gives me rights to have an access to his mind.” Then you simply give Person-X that cookie. Alternatively you could also decide that every time you touch someones shoulder with your fore finger, it means “I remove all your rights to me” or “You stay ignorant to my methods”, etc. It is completely up to you to decide how your actions will affect others.

Regardless of who or what the target of your effect is, the method is always the same if no-one contests your intended effect. You simply describe how you intend things to be, and then it ends up being so if it isn’t already. You could describe someones reaction to some specific upcoming event they will be in. Or you could describe some detail of the license plate of the next car you’ll see. You could state that the environment makes a loud noise if something is true. You could even state that someones life is developing huge challenges.

Magick doesn’t break laws of physics

The effects of your statements never break any laws of physics. Consequently they always follow the logical chain of cause and effect. This means that the effects must have started gearing towards the intended results a long time ago before they actually manifest themselves in the physical world. If this wasn't the case, there would be observable violations of laws of physics¹ as the chain of cause and effect would be broken.

With magick, everything seems to happen by pure coincidence: If you stated that your targeted person will react in a certain way to something, that person will coincidentally naturally think about just the right things which direct that person to react the way you stated. Alternatively that person might experience some event or has already experienced something, which makes that person react the way you intended. Regardless of the exact route the situation develops, the end result will be what you described it being.

If you try to repeat the effect, it quite likely won't happen again. Otherwise you could easily break the laws of physics by making the same thing happen on command ten thousand times in a row. That being said, the effects apparently completely ignore time and distance, meaning that the past, the present and the future can be affected.

The universe

The effects of magick seem to be machinated in a highly intelligent way: You only need to specify the desired end result and apparent coincidences lead to that end result. All of this indicates that some all encompassing intelligence has set things in our universe so, that everyone's decisions and agreements/disagreements are taken into account, within the limits of the laws of physics.

Apparently there is something beyond our minds and beyond our physical world, which affects all of us equally. That something machinates all the events throughout the history of the universe, from the smallest atomic particles all the way up to the largest events in the history of the universe. This includes all the events and moments in each persons life, from the moment they are born to the moment they die. To us they appear as pure coincidences which follow the intentions of the magick user. That something which machinates all of it could be called “God”.

¹ This indicates that either the effects of magick were set into motion already at the beginning of our universe, OR alternatively our past and future aren't fully defined and might even be forever changing. It is unknown at the time of writing this which one of these two options is more likely true.

In short: You set laws/rules in your mind what experiences and events the universe brings to you and to other people. Then some all encompassing intelligence carries out those laws/rules, machinating everything in the universe according to the laws/rules you set. What you say, happens, if no-one objects to it.

Apparently one isn’t even required to believe in the magick effect working. Simply wanting it to be true when stating things seems to be enough. This might be why people talk about “beginners luck”, when someone tries something new for the first time and still manages to outperform seasoned veterans in their own game: magick effects usually work the first time.

Removing an active effect

If you notice an effect which you suspect of being caused by someones statement, you can remove it by simply making a counter statement which denies the effect. For example if you feel fear, you can state one or more of the following:

- “Everyone in the world: Don’t cause me fear.”
- “I am not letting anyone cause me fear.”
- “I am not afraid.”

Apparently you can affect the person who caused the effect you experience, even if you don’t know who that person is. You do this by turning your focus on the adverse effect you’re experiencing. Then state something to that effect like it was a real person right in front of you. This way you can set rules/commands without ever having met that person.

Element transfers

Apparently abstract elements of personal life can be transferred from one person to another. Examples of such elements are alcoholism, an enjoyable job, support network of friends, people giving respect, good financial stability, being able to make good choices, gullibility to trouble, belief in false information / delusions, etc. Even helping someone momentarily can count as an element you gave to your target. The element can never be neutral. After all, by definition the element somehow affects its hosts life.

These elements can be transferred as single whole units like they were physical items. If alcoholism is transferred from one person to another, the original host doesn't have alcohol cravings anymore and the new host experiences all those craving. So the original host gave away the alcoholism to the next person.

Owner vs. host

Each transferrable element has an owner and a host. These aren't necessarily one and the same person. The owner is the person who initially received/created that exact instance of the element. The host is the current person holding it in his/her possession. Regardless of who the current host is, the owner apparently always has the following power over the element:

- Can take back the element: the host cannot resist this process.
- Can alter its effect on its host.
- Can reach the host to send new effects.

The following points are unknown:

- What power does the host hold over the element?
- Is it possible to give only portions of such elements to another person?
- Can the element be shared between more than one person?
- Does stating something actually create the element out of nothing?
 - Orders it from the universe / an all encompassing intelligence?
 - Transfers it from somewhere/someone else to the target?
 - Something else? What?
- Is the one stating something automatically the owner of the element or is the targeted person the owner?
- Are the elements just rules and regulations that move from on person to the next, or are they actual units of "something".

* * *

All of these would indicate different things how the universe actually works.

Affecting the host with your element

Apparently when someone takes an element you own (be it spiritual, social, or physical), you have the power to decide how it affects its host. This seems to work for elements which you intentionally and knowingly gave away, as well as to those which were taken from you without your knowledge or consent. If the host is ignorant of receiving an element from you, you can still affect that person the same way.

You could barter with others using the elements you own. You could also probably set restrictions to how/for what the host is able to use the element you gave. Alternatively you could set sanctions for any misuse of your element. Apparently you can also set conditions to the transferred element, so that if those conditions are met some time in the future, then the element starts affecting that persons life in some different way.

You could also decide that the host transfers benefits to you as long as he/she doesn't return your element back to you. But as the target is the owner and you're the host of those new elements you receive, he/she can decide how they affect you. This indicates that people are meant to use common sense, good morales and free will when using this mechanism of the universe to transfer or barter with elements. You need to be able to trust the other person and not be ignorant of the mechanism to not get conned.

Essentially all this means that if someone takes or steals something from you (be it something spiritual, social, or physical), you can punish that person in all sorts of creative ways, and you don't even need to know who the culprit was.

In other words. "When you give something, you can get something in return. You can alter at later time how what you gave affects its host." It is unknown if you actually are required to give before you can receive something in return.

A warning about con men

People are apparently meant to decide together how and when these exchanges happen. Usually after such a transfer the person either wants the element back (if the transaction was not beneficial to him/her), or wants to keep the transaction as it was (in case it was fair and mutually beneficial). As the universe gives a way to reverse such exchanges or to punish the other person, that would naturally make both sides of the transfer careful to ensure they'll know exactly what they get and that it is acceptable for both parties before they decide on such deals. Since objections from someone can easily nullify such contracts, they work only between non-resisting parties. I.e. neither side of the transaction objects to the exchange. Unfortunately if such a deal was made using covert communication, it is possible to deceive/con the other person without him/her being aware that such a deal was made.

Apparently this exact method is used to exploit people, which is the source of a lot of misery and trouble people are having in their lives on a global scale. This includes seemingly mundane trouble, the inability to achieve personal goals, as well as what people attribute to supernatural experiences. Apparently this is the exact knowledge the covert occultists have hidden from the general population: that you're giving away such elements on a daily basis and being ignorant of it. If you knew it was happening and what elements you gave away, you could simply state that some specific element you own causes its host trouble in case it is not yourself, and that it brings you benefits. That would stop con men from benefitting in your expense.

Examples of element transfers

- "I give you this $20 bill, and you give me X in return."
- "I give you an example of Z, and you give me X in return."
- "I give you this experience of me saying/doing something nice to you, and you give me X in return."
- "I give you this. You give me everything."

Notes about element transfers and statements

Apparently it is possible to use element transfers to know/see/hear what another person is thinking, feeling or receiving from the universe. Observations indicate that the following types of statements apparently could be used to achieve such effects:

* * *

- "I hear your thoughts."
- "I can know your deepest and darkest thoughts and ideas."
- "Show me what you have."

It is unknown at the time of writing this what other statements are required for them to work for everyone single person.

Apparently it is also possible to reset/steal/ruin someones lifes work; all that he/she has built up so far that brings him/her good things in life:

- "Give me everything."
- "Give me what you have."
- "I give you this. You give me everything."
- "You're left with nothing."
- "You get nothing."
- "You can lose everything."
- "You start again from scratch / You move back to the beginning / square one."
- "Wouldn't it be nice to be able to start from scratch / to do it all over again?" (asks for permissions to interfere with the target)
- "You don't know."
- "You get ridiculed."
- "There's no future."
- "Everything's challenging."

Other common uses of such transfers and statements appear to be:

- Make the target state something in his/her mind while asleep, for the benefit of the magick user, or for the disadvantage of the target or his friends/loved ones/allies/etc.
- Make the target invite/contact another person via mind while being unaware of doing so.
- Make the targets statements automatically delay/fail until the magick user reviews and approves approves them.
- Makes the targets statements automatically bring benefits to the magick user instead, in the cost of the target. I.e. The magick user is the receiver of the benefits instead of the target.
- Makes all of the targets efforts to achieve something lead up to nothing.

- Make the target believe in things which aren't true nor real, or not believe in things which actually are true and real.
- Make the target not realize/observe/believe they are being affected.
- Make the target experience/see/hear things which aren't real.
- Make the target have experiences which they attribute to deities/spirits/demons/etc.
- Make the target's mind/body/emotions/life events react in a violent way when the target opposes the will of the magick user, or whenever the magick user wants it to happen.
- Affect the target's will to act or make decisions against his/her own intentions, decisions and benefit.
- Cause the target experience vivid, tormenting, life like dreams.
- Implant false memories to the target's mind, often done through vivid life like dreams which are faked as actual memories that happened in the real world.
- Cut the target's ties to all of his/her friends, family, allies, support network and society.
- Define what type of social responses the target receives from others, be it positive or negative.
- Cause illness or all sorts of constant misfortune to the target.

Misconceptions about magick

Contrary to common beliefs, apparently magic is not implemented using any sorts of energies or spirits. Also meditative mind does not seem to affect the outcome. Also all spells and rituals are redundant as they are apparently just convoluted and bastardized ways of stating your meaning to the universe.

Apparently praying doesn't work. What actually does work is that the theist states something for the effect of "God will help me to get over this situation" before or after his/her prayer. So it's the statement itself which has the power to affect the theist's life, and not the prayer itself.

Trade Theory Of Magick

Here I present what my research and experiments currently indicate about the fundamentals of nature of magick and how the universe / God actually seems to function in our world. The below information seems to fit really well with all my observations and results of the experiments I have conducted so far.

Essentially the universe/God is supposed to deliver what we want. This fundamental mechanism works according to each individuals Free Will:

1. The universe/God lets each individual decide what they want from the universe.
2. The universe/God also lets people decide between themselves what they want the universe/God to handle between the individuals, so that Free Will isn't violated by others.
3. When you get something from someone else, the other person can set a price for it, which you automatically pay.
4. The price can be set beforehand or afterwards.
5. The trade happens automatically, whether you're aware of its existence or not.
6. Each individual can set their own rules and restrictions about what they're willing to give/receive, and how it is allowed to happen.

Essentially the universe/God is observing each individuals wants and executing the above rules letting all conscious beings, such as humans, build their own lives and define which life events they will experience. This apparently is the fundamental core mechanism of how magick and rituals actually work, as well as how people "develop" psychic abilities and the sixth sense.

Here are a few examples of what kind of spiritual things people can apparently trade with: happiness, years of life, easy ways through challenges, hearing/knowing what the other person thinks or feels, the right to adjust or limit what someone is able to do and achieve, the right to develop an imagined but convincing character into ones mind, to create vivid real lifelike dreams which are confused for real memories or life experiences, the right to adjust what kind of things the person believes and disbelieves, the right to control someones emotions and body reactions, etc.

Example #1

Person-X WANTS TO BE FAMOUS AND ADMIRER by people, so he makes content on Youtube. He eventually manages to get lots of followers who like the content he creates. Now Person-X receives what he wants from his viewers: admiration. This means that any of his Youtube content viewers who like any of his videos can set their own price for the attention and admiration they gave to Person-X. Each of them can want to take/receive good things from Person-X, or even want bad things to happen to Person-X as a payment for their services to him. Now any such person can harm Person-X and his life by wanting what he has, or by wanting him to experience harmful/negative things. Essentially Person-Xs fans have control over the trade.

Example #2

Person-X WANTS TO HELP people, so he makes informative content on Youtube. He eventually manages to get lots of followers who like the content he creates. Now people receive help from the content he creates, which allows Person-X to set the price for his help. When someone genuinely wants to help others with the action he performs, by definition he wants advantages/benefits for the target of his help. This means that the targets are unlikely to receive direct negative impact from Person-Xs wants or the prices he sets. But if the morals or the ideology of Person-X are twisted beyond what's objectively good, he might want his followers to do/experience/cause something that would be considered highly immoral by other people. For example the followers could start affecting the world in a way which causes spreading of misinformation, harmful ideologies or suffering. Essentially Person-X has control over the trade.

Things to keep in mind

So apparently it is dangerous to do things for the wrong reasons. Depending on what your attitude, even when you're giving, you could actually be buying, as was explained in Example #1. It is also dangerous for the society if there are lots of demoralized people, as was explained in Example #2.

Apparently there is no way around this "trade mechanism". One can only set rules and restrictions what kind of people they will "trade" with, and what they are willing / not willing to part with and receive. Being ignorant about this mechanism makes one an automatic target of exploitation via this mechanism, caused either intentionally or unintentionally by others.

Demoralized people are the main issue here. Thinking that following a benevolent religion or ideology automatically makes one immune to not causing harm to the world via this mechanism is highly naive and ignorant. As was seen in the two examples, apparently the attitude and morals (and not the religion or ideology itself) define the real end results of what this mechanism causes to the world. As there are a large number of highly religious, atheistic and politically extreme people in the world, they are bound to cause lots of harm to others with their degraded morals.

Why Hand Signs And Code Language Fundamentally Work

Real occultists (aka “spiritual warfare oppressors”) use all sorts of obscure hand signs while speaking to other people. Some of those signs are fairly hard to perform and require some actual practise before they can be used properly, especially while speaking. Due to the difficulty of using many of them, it is safe to say that they aren’t used by accident, especially by regular people. Since they aren’t accidental hand signs, this means that those hand signs have some very specific meanings assigned to them.

If real occultists wanted to use their hand signs so that their discussion partners understood the meanings behind them, they would use them only when discussing with other real occultists. However, this is not the case: they use those same hand signs also when communicating with regular people. If their hand signs have some secret meaning assigned to them, that would leave important parts of their communication hidden or even misunderstood by the regular people. So why use them at all when communicating with regular people? Are the hand signs just a habit the real occultists follow, so they can always speak their true mind, which is understood only by those who know the true meaning of the hand signs they use?

Regardless of what the actual answer to that question is, observations have proven time and time again that real occultists are able to create effects when using such hand signs. Some of those effects happen instantaneously, while others take much more time to manifest. This is a clear indication that those hand signs can be used to command real power. Essentially this means that since they can be used to create effects, those hand signs have a much deeper and more important role than superficial communication. They seem to communicate (give instructions or commands) which effects or events the real occultists want their targets to experience in their lives, and then those effects happen in real life.

Based on the above observation, it is quite likely that there is "something" in each and every person, which automatically reacts to such covert methods of communication. Once the communication is done, that "something" in the listener starts implementing the covertly given instructions. Whatever that "something" actually is, is debatable. It could be your own subconscious, some specific part of your mind, your soul, God, or maybe even your very own fate in our universe.

Regardless of what that "something" actually is, it doesn't seem to matter at all if the listener does not understand the true meaning behind those words and hand signs. The listener still starts experiencing those effects described by the real occultist. But the real occultists themselves seem to be able to block those effects quite often. This indicates that the effects most likely start happening if the listener doesn't directly object to what is being instructed to happen. By not directly objecting to the given instructions seems to count as an OK for that "something" which then starts implementing those instructions.

All this indicates that there is no real "magick" to any of those words and hand signs the real occultists are using. The process of communicating your ideas to another person in itself seems to be what essentially affects your own and the listeners life events. In other words: by communicating your ideas directly in plain english, without any covert meanings assigned to your words, is likely going to produce the exact same effects in the listener. This happens, of course, only if the listener doesn't object to what instructions or commands they are given. This is most likely why real occultists communicate their true intentions to their targets using covert methods: if the listeners don't understand the true meaning of the communication, they cannot object.

As real occultists around the world seem to be using this same method, it seems to work with all languages. But language is only one form of communication humans have invented. There are numerous other ways to communicate your ideas to other people. This in itself is a strong indication that this same concept should apply also to any and all other forms of communication. So this method is most likely NOT restricted to working only with speech. This would also explain the hand signs the real occultists are using.

As all forms of communication are likely to work with this concept, it would be logical for it to work also when you are NOT having a face-to-face communication with your target. It should be enough for you to send your target a letter or e-mail, or let him see a sigil or a logo. Alternatively you could perform a ritual, spell, dance, or even send a picture on social media platform for your target(s) to see. It should be possible to embed this method into Youtube videos, songs, movies, art, ads and magazines. Any and all sorts of media should work equally well as long as people see, hear or otherwise consume the information, content or entertainment you produce. Simply decide what instructions you intend to convey to the consumer of your media and that should make it work.

Create Your Own Magick Code Language Using Idioms

When people agree on how something is in their lives, The Universe/God seems to automatically make things move toward that definition. For example if you decide that "XYZ always keeps happening to me!" then that is what keeps happening to you. Similarly if you agree to someone else's statement that "XYZ always keeps happening to you", then again that is what keeps happening to you. This seems to happen even when people are talking about different things, believing they are talking about the same thing. So validating a statement makes things gear towards what the one making the statement actually meant, regardless of if the listener truly understood what was being discussed or not.

Covert occultists seem to exploit this feature of The Universe/God to gain advantage over their victims. They do this by making statements in their speech about how things are or how they will end up being. If their victim validates what the occultist said, then it automatically sets rules/restrictions for things to follow in both of their lives. This can be used, for example, to strip the other person of anything which gives him happiness, health, love, friends, safety and wealth, and maybe even make the occultist gain those same things into his own life at the same time.

These occultists use covert ways to deliver these statements to their targets. One of these methods is to make it sound like consecutive sentences are about the same topic, when in fact they are not. Here are two examples of such sentence pairs:

1. "Just think what happens if you accidentally burn your house down. You lose everything you've gained in your life."
2. "You said that you want to stop smoking and give me your cigarettes? I take everything you have."

In both examples the two sentences sound logical, true and benevolent in nature when they're delivered together. Because of this it's natural for the listener to agree to what had been said. Infact, it would be hard to disagree with those sentences without sounding weird, so the response of the listener is almost guaranteed to validate the occultists sentences.

When the occultist delivers the second sentence in each example, he doesn't think of the first sentence at all. He only concentrates on delivering the second one in isolation of everything else, meaning every word he says. "You lose everything you've gained in your life" and "I take everything you have" sound truly malevolent when you isolate them from the rest of the conversation. But no-one notices anything odd happening in that conversation when those lines are delivered.

Another covert way of delivering these types of statements is to use idioms. For example you could decide that every time you use the word "it" combined with any word describing an action (without extra words between them), you are talking about your discussion partner. For example "It feels horrible" would be the same as "You feel horrible". "When it's alone, it hears voices" would be the same as "When you're alone, you hear voices". It's easy to see how this could be used in conjunction with the first example, where the covert occultist would first deliver the decoy sentence and then the actual one with the intended effect:

1. "My dog fell ill yesterday. It feels worse every day."
2. "Janes neighbour Ben fell terminally ill. It causes lots of trouble to family and friends."

The first sentence would make the listener feel worse every day, and the second one would make the listener cause trouble to his own family and friends. Notice that these types of sentences don't automatically invite validation from the listener. To remedy this issue, the occultist could add an extra sentence, like "I should probably look into it." Now it's much more likely that the discussion partner validates the sentences. Additionally, if the word "it" in that extra sentence was given a meaning of referring to the discussion partner, that would open doors for the occultist to gain rights to "peek into" the life or mind of his discussion partner.

But speech is just one form of communication humans have invented. Other forms include writing, hand signs, icons, sigils, spells, rituals, songs, photos, paintings, videos, movies, stories, art, etc. All of them should be equally valid methods of delivering intentions/messages and receiving validation from people. The possibilities are almost endless with this feature of how The Universe/God operates.

Now imagine if you combined some of these methods with covert hand signs, to which you had given special meanings, you could expand these techniques almost limitlessly. That's a huge amount of options how to affect people covertly, and that is exactly what the covert occultists have been doing for a very long time. Also imagine what would be possible to do with song lyrics, which the masses listen to, relating to the lyrics and agreeing with them on a daily basis. In fact, delivering these types of sentences as an example in this type of an article would likely work if the writer would mean it in a covert way (which I did not), so be careful with all the media you consume.

APPENDIX: Theories About Magick

This is an appendix to the section “Magick Ignores Time And Language”. Listed here are theories about magick, most of which have a good chance of being true, but they have not yet been proven so.

Magick is done completely inside your own mind.

- You do it by communicating your intention to your target or to the universe/God itself.

Magick completely ignores communication medium/format.

- As magick completely ignores language, and language is just one form of communication, this could mean that magick is completely agnostic to all methods of communication; you can probably use written words, photos, videos, audio clips, dance, art, etc. to affect others.
- You can interact using magick via all mundane formats.
- You can communicate using magick via all mundane formats.
- You can communicate by sending words directly into minds.
- Seeing a picture/video can be used to cause an effect or to bring some idea into the mind of the person who sees that picture.
- Large number of magick users are covertly affecting people who use Youtube videos and other media and social media platforms.

You can affect minds with magick.

- When affecting minds, the targets usually stay completely oblivious to the fact that they have been affected.

- NOTE: “Affecting” might be different to “Interacting”: Making people experience events does not directly interact with minds, but affects the persons fate.

People and events are treated equally when creating magick effects.

- Peoples emotional and mental reactions to everything in their lives can be thought of as events. So magick might only directly affect events instead of smaller concepts such as minds. Affecting events affects minds, which then make the targets mind do whatever you wanted it to do.
- Essentially you did not interact with the mind, but you affected the mind indirectly by interacting with the whole world so its events made your targets mind, by coincidence, do what you wanted it to do. NOTE: This automatically takes into account the Free Will of your targets: since the influence comes from the environment instead of you directly affecting the mind, then your targets ALWAYS have their own will/ decision that can override their impulses created by the environmental stimuli they are experiencing.
- Synchronizities can be created to self and others.
- People can be made to experience real world events, such as finding new friends, or getting into accidents. Essentially these are also just synchronizities as are “angel numbers” people see in their lives, etc.
- Together these points sound like magick is meant to be used as a tool to build your own life as you want it to be, choosing what types of events you want to experience.

You can affect people who make a connection to you using magick.

- You don’t even need to know the identity of that person who made the connection to you and /or affected you.

Magick automatically affects several points of time for you to experience the intended effect:

- This means that magick adjusts history according to your wants and needs. Or rather it decides outside of time the real reasons behind the events you machinated using magick: You affecting someone through a video is the reason why that person in the past did what he did. If you hand’t tried affecting that person, he might still have done what he did, but there would be a different reason behind it.

- Alternative explanation would be that the fate of that person in the video was linked to your own, so both of your actions were synchronized (synchronizities) to each other so that person's personal actions, experiences and decisions in his life worked seamlessly with your own wants and wishes, so you could observe the effects you wanted at the time you were choosing.
- Could this be used to make a person send you information about specific thoughts or events happening to him/her? You would receive all that information at the same time, at the time of your choosing, both from the past and from the future?

Your target doesn't have to be aware of you in any way.

- This, combined with the fact that you can use whatever language you want, indicates that you should be able to use all kinds of covert self-invented methods to affect others. Your targets would not be aware of what you're doing to them right in front of them.
- This must be the underlying idea why and how Witch Language works. (A code language used by large number of occultists to covertly affect their discussion partners, etc.).

QUESTION: What level of you being aware of your target is required for magick to work? At least seeing your target in a video footage is enough, as was observed several times in this article. This requires testing.